16. Write a literary analysis of the short story "The Lighthouse Keeper."
The lighthouse beam swept across the restless sea, a lonely finger of light in the vast darkness. Inside, Elara sat by the window, her gaze fixed on the horizon. For years, she'd kept the light, a silent sentinel against the storm. Each night, she'd watched the ships pass, their lights blinking like distant stars.
Tonight, there was only the storm, the wind howling like a lost soul. A small, wooden boat appeared, tossed and turned by the waves, its single lantern flickering. Elara gripped the railing, her heart pounding. She knew the treacherous rocks that lurked beneath the surface. She adjusted the beam, guiding the boat toward the safe passage. As the boat slipped through, its lantern a tiny spark in the night, Elara felt a wave of relief. Then, a sudden silence. The storm had passed, leaving only the gentle lapping of waves against the shore. She looked out, the sea calm, the stars bright. The boat was gone. She smiled, a small, tired smile. Her duty was done.
